Biographical Note

Jacob Gitelman (1899-1991) graduated from New York University Law School and settled in Rochester in 1923. During his tenure as a City Court judge from 1934 to 1940, Gitelman’s progressive views and interest in social welfare prompted him to enforce jail sentences on those caught driving while intoxicated. Taking into consideration the social and economic ramifications of jail time, Gitelman introduced the “weekend sentence,” which allowed people to serve their time on weekends or other convenient days so that their employment and family life were not jeopardized. After its initiation in 1935, the weekend sentence became widespread throughout New York State. In addition, Gitelman advocated for the establishment of a Family & Children’s court and reforestation camps for the rehabilitation of alcoholics. Throughout his life, Gitelman was involved in many charitable and community causes, serving as president of the Safety Council, Community Recreation Council, City Club, American Jewish Committee of Rochester, Monroe County branch of the American Cancer Society, the Rochester Board of Education, and the Legal Aid Society, in addition to terms on boards of countless other organizations. In 1937, he co-founded of the Philosophers’ Club. Gitelman’s wife Belle, an artist, was a graduate of the Eastman School of Music and a board member of the Memorial Art Gallery.

Scope and Content

The Jacob Gitelman/Philosophers’ Club papers comprise approximately one cubic foot of materials related to Gitelman’s career as a private attorney and City Court judge. The papers, which date from 1936 to 1991, include speeches, programs, awards, correspondence, newspaper clippings, and photographs. In addition to the papers Gitelman presented to the Philosophers’ Club, there are also several papers by other members. Also included are correspondence, meeting notes and schedules, and member lists related to the Philosopher’s Club. The collection includes a program signed by Chief Justice William H. Rehnquist, and letters signed by Representative Frank Horton, Jimmy Carter, and Joseph C. Wilson.
